

ERRATUM

Two lines were omitted from Ralph Shlomowitz's article "The Fiji Labor Trade in Comparative Perspective, 1864-1914" (vol. 9, no. 3, July 1986), at the bottom of page 146. The correct note, printed in its entirety, reads as follows:

26. The dramatic rise in the passage money charged by recruiters in the period 1880-1884 reflects the increased costs of recruiting in trying to meet this increased demand for labor. This is shown by a consideration of the parallel increase in the statistic on the average number of days spent recruiting per recruit obtained (see table 6). The enormous variability in the success of individual recruiting voyages during this period is shown by a consideration of the variability of this statistic for individual voyages. In 1884 the range in this statistic was from 1.2 to 15.1; for the raw data on which this statistic is calculated, see Annual Report on Immigration (Polynesian), 1884, p. 4. For comparable data on this increase in costs and in the increase in the variability of success of individual voyages in the Queensland segment of the labor trade during this period, see Shlomowitz 1981b.
